To combat this inequity, fair trade organizations created shops where one could buy handicrafts and culturally unique goods at “fair” prices. The above-market price offered was considered a donation of sorts, and there remain segments of the fair-trade movement that retain this perspective and limit their focus accordingly.

Fair trade is the only mainstream model that guarantees a minimum price to help coffee producers through hard times like these. On top of that, producers who sell on fair trade terms earn an additional amount per pound in Community Development Funds to spend on quality and productivity improvements and addressing community needs.
