by Luke Wayne. 4/11/16. Return to the Buddhism Page. Buddhism and Christianity make mutually exclusive truth claims at nearly every essential point. There is simply no way to combine these two systems without completely redefining one or both of them. Since the 1960s, however, as Buddhism has made increasing inroads into western life and as American culture has become more and more pluralistic, one can increasingly find people who self-identify as being both Buddhist and Christian.

Is Buddhism Compatible with Christianity? | CARM.org

However, a closer examination of the results from a Buddhist perspective reveals that it is not contradicting at all. Buddhists believe that everyone is capable of good and bad, but only until we reach enlightenment will we be truly good. Like Christianity, Buddhism stresses free will and choices, including intent, to do good or bad.
