Fraser's work as a critic was noted for his analyses of 20th-century literature, especially in his titles The Modern Writer and His World and Vision and Rhetoric. His pioneering studies of Ezra Pound and Lawrence Durrell appeared at times when those writers did not enjoy general critical favor. Fraser's criticism, according to Norman MacCaig, "has been remarkable, not only for its perceptiveness, but for its civilised good manners and its consistent aim to see and enlarge the best in ...

Furthermore, writers who adopted the Modern point of view often did so quite deliberately and self-consciously. Indeed, a central preoccupation of Modernism is with the inner self and consciousness. In contrast to the Romantic world view, the Modernist cares rather little for Nature, Being, or the overarching structures of history.
