Obligations Future Generations Philosophical Monographs

When this seminal collection of essays was first published in 1978, the philosophical 'problem' of obligations to future generations was not widely recognised. But as the contributors point out, the theories that have constituted the stock-in-trade of moral philosophers for the past two hundred years often produce weird and counter-intuitive results when they are extended to try to include those who are as yet unborn.

Predictable results of global climate change seem to suggest that we have an obligation to make sacrifices to stem the tide of climate change—primarily for the sake of future generations. Do we, in fact, have obligations to persons who will exist only in the future and, if so, how we can coherently explain the basis for these obligations? The chapter addresses the following questions. First, do future persons have interests, moral status, and rights? Second, are our obligations to future ...

On Moral Obligations to Future Generations

It makes perfect sense according to the metaphysics of Aristotle (and, thus, according to Thomism) that one might have some moral obligations to future generations that do not exist. This is because in Aristotle, there is a middle ground between the real, actual, full existence of a thing and the complete non-existence.

Utilitarianism, Supererogation and Future Generations

The question about moral obligations to future generations is sometimes approached in a backwards manner. In those instances it is simply assumed that we must have some moral obligations to future generations, and if a moral theory leads us to think that we do not, then there must be something wrong with the theory in question.

Moral Obligations to Future Generations | Justice and Hedonism

This chapter explores the specificities, strengths, and weaknesses of the idea of reciprocity as a basis for intergenerational obligations. Three models are presented: descending, ascending, and double reciprocity. Each of these three models is tested against three objections. The first objection asks why having received something from someone would necessarily entail the obligation to give back.
