The difference between "the other" and "another" in the phrases "from one cook to the other" and "from one cook to another" is basically the same one that distinguishes "the X" from "a [or an] X": The phrase "from one cook to the other" implies that the speaker or writer has already introduced two specific cooks to the hearer or reader and is now referring to those specific persons.

grammar - From one to another or From one to the other ...

One from another seems to be preferred over from one another by people with a fixation on parsing words in sentences, because the preposition from has a clear object: another separated from (or influencing) one.

The One from the Other by Philip Kerr | LibraryThing

There is very little difference in meaning between each other and one another. One another is fairly formal, and many people do not use it at all. Some people prefer to use each other when they are talking about two people or things, and one another when they are talking about more than two. However, most people do not make this distinction.
