Novgorod School of Icon Painting. There is a very marked difference in approach between the Christian art of Dionysius, the third great Russian icon-painter of the Novgorod school, and that of his great predecessor Andrei Rublev (c.1360-1430). It should probably be ascribed to the interest which later 15th century Novgorodian painters began to take in composition.

Dionysius: Russian Icon Painter, Novgorod School of Painting

In the Painters Manual, Dionysius prescribes gypsum as the inert filler for gesso. However, the majority of painters in Russia used chalk. Chalk grounds are characterized by its brilliant whiteness and the visual effect of chromatic depth created when light passing through layers of paint is reflected from the surface of the ground.
