Reviewed in the United States on May 1, 2009. For those familiar, primarily, with Kafka's fictions, these aphorisms come as a pleasant surprise. Everything is here in a compressed way. One of my favorites: "The crows like to insist a single crow is enough to destroy heaven.

The Zúrau Aphorisms: Franz Kafka, Michael Hofmann ...

This edition of Kafka's aphorisms contains both his better-known Zúrau Aphorisms, and writings under the title of "He" : Notes from the Year 1920. The aphorisms read like fragments from Heraclitus, heavy with the boundlessness of pre-Socratic philosophy; yet with that unique style, tone, and touch that is Kafka's.

The Zúrau Aphorisms by Franz Kafka - Goodreads

Kafka took up residence with his sister Ottla in Zúrau, a small town in northern Bohemia, shortly after being diagnosed with tuberculosis in early September, 1917. It seems likely most of the aphorisms were composed at Zúrau, even though some material does originate later.

Zúrau Aphorisms

While working on K., his major book on Kafka, in the Bodleian Library, Roberto Calasso realized that the Zúrau aphorisms, each written on a separate slip of very thin paper, numbered but unbound, represented something unique in Kafka's opus--a work whose form he had created simultaneously with its content.The notebooks, freshly translated and laid out as Kafka had intended, are a distillation of Kafka at his most powerful and enigmatic.

The life of the crow = the death of heaven (individuation) The death of the crow = an entrance to heaven (oneness) The aphorism says nothing about heaven for heaven is merely a state of existence which precludes independent objects. For heaven to exist there can be no crow. Heaven is the impossibility of crows.
